PLANT CARE

Gradually introducing seedlings to outdoor growing conditions increases their food reserves, reduces the severity of transplant shock, and increases the chance of survival in the garden. This process is called hardening.

About 7 to 10 days before setting plants in the ground, place the seedlings in a shady, protected location outdoors. Over the next several days, gradually expose the seedlings to longer periods of sunlight.

Allow the plants to dry slightly between waterings. During the hardening process, move the seedlings indoors if the forecast calls for temperatures below 40°F.

Master Gardeners suggest all plants purchased from the Plant Sale go through this process before being planted outside.

Gardening for Butterflies and Pollinators

The flash of a colorful butterfly and the buzz of a bumble bee traveling between flowers bring extra beauty and enjoyment to our gardens. Planning your garden or landscape to include plants that attract and sustain butterflies, bees, and other beneficial insects can increase the populations of these desired insects and increase the diversity you can observe and enjoy. You will also be doing your part to help preserve butterflies, honey bees and pollinators that are threatened and in decline.
